It has been statistically proven that in many cases small businesses lose out to big corporations for a simple reason: they don't look big enough. It is not that the small guys don't have the product or the service that will serve the end customer sufficiently. It is simply that they don't have many of the tools that large businesses use. One Los Angeles-based entrepreneur, Chris Kerstner (USC Alumnus), has not only taken note of this handicap that small businesses have, but is going the extra mile to make sure that all small businesses can have the tools they need to compete in a large business environment.

Eight years ago the employees and advisors to Kerstner's company, Streamlined Fusion (www.streamlinedfusion.com), came to a simple but stark realization: by marketing their clients as larger companies, they would achieve greater levels of success. This philosophy became a pillar for every website, logo, and promotional material they brought to life for their clients. By providing actual customized tools small businesses could use to grow larger, Streamlined Fusion gained recognition as being much more valuable than the average business marketing company.

Streamlined Fusion's latest undertaking hopes to take their current Small Business clients and other small businesses to the next level with a professional phone system known as Digisist (www.digisist.com). In functionality, Digisist is identical to the phone systems typically used by large enterprises with a digital receptionist, call transferring, call recording, and multiple departments. The difference is that while enterprise-level phone systems typically cost thousands of dollars due to the high price of hardware and maintenance, Digisist provides all of this to small businesses starting at $7.95 a month. A company spokesman indicated that there is no long term contractual agreements and that setup is handled completely by a Digisist representative.

"We're thrilled to have the opportunity to provide small businesses with more of the vital means they need to grow," stated Company President Chris Kerstner. "While the Digisist phone system concept is simple, we take pride in the fact that we have uncovered
